A drought-stricken landscape of grassy horizons and sand dunes has been brought back from the brink of desertification with intensive management. The recently designated North Kohala Regional Park is one of the world's most innovative parks, and its success is being heralded as a model of ecosystem-based management that other parks can follow. The Ko'rai Desert is part of the Kohala District of North Kohala, Hawaii. The landscape is composed of hundreds of thousands of acres of floodplain and marshlands, currently undergoing the process of desertification, which is the direct result of years of poor land management practices, overgrazing, and poorly planned development. In 2010, the Kohala District adopted a 5-year Strategic Plan and pledged to begin to reverse the effects of desertification on the area's fragile ecosystems. In 2015, the district appointed an ecosystem coordinator, who oversaw a collaboration with several different agencies and organizations to begin the process of correcting the status quo. In the years following, several watersheds were restored. The Ko'rai Desert Conservation Area was fully designated as a Regional Park, eliminating the possibility of development within the boundaries of the park. During the designation process, the best available land for purchase was identified and a mitigation bank was created to preserve the environment and restore watersheds within the boundaries of the new park. This is what a successful ecosystem-based park looks like. ~Ooi, 2016Q: Notification of callers phones being unlocked in the system tray using c# I need
